They rewarded people with free shaving products for sharing their referral link through email, Facebook, and Twitter. Experiences are powerful because they give employees something memorable to share with their friends and coworkers, and build excitement as employees come back to the office to talk about the awesome activity or adventure they had with their referral reward.

Increasing your referral sources really comes down to developing relationships. Next time you think of rubber chicken, think leverage, think networking, think business. We like to say that you can only burn a referral source. You need to spend time to determine who is your ideal COI referral source, along with your ideal client referral source.

After all, a happy customer can be your salesperson—and not just for bringing in a sale. Do you offer an exciting experience for employees instead of a gift card or cash prize? Regardless, I only recommend products or services I use personally and believe will add value to my readers.
