Mazzoni, S. Racial profiling refers to the practice of selecting specific racial groups for greater levels of criminal justice surveillance.

Religiously, every community mentioned bears and preserves distinct beliefs. At the other end of the continuum are assimilation, expulsion, and even genocide – stark examples of intolerant intergroup relations. Based on the assumption, Sakamoto et al. Unprejudiced nondiscriminators are open-minded, tolerant, and accepting. This is represented in Canada by the metaphor of the mosaic, which suggests that in a multicultural society each ethnic or racial group preserves its unique cultural traits while together contributing to national unity. In assimilation, groups combine to form a new group identity.
